
MARK E. FRANK

Mark E. Frank is an Assistant Professor of History and Coordinator of the History major at Fulbright University Vietnam. He has published several articles about the Sino-Tibetan borderlands, including the microhistories of Chinese weather stations and experimental farms on the Tibetan plateau in the early 20th century. His book in progress, The Rooted State: Plants and Power on the Chinese Frontier, shows how ideas about agrarian colonization traveled between different settings on the Chinese frontier during the Republican era, when the state itself was deeply fractious. It combines micro- and macro-perspectives to illustrate that the experiences of individuals and communities often reverberate with those of distant strangers in surprising ways.
